World War 2 – 1943

John Thompson Strategic analyst - quotes from his book "Spirit Over Steel"

May 16th: The Japanese defences start to be displaced on Attu. The SS Brigade leader Stroop announces the end of resistance in the Warsaw Ghetto by blowing up its Synagogue; but despite killing 14,000 Jews and railing 40,000 more to Treblinka a few survivors are still free and fighting. The Soviets contain German counterattacks in the Kuban Peninsula. The Dambusters raid goes in tonight with 19 well trained elite bomber crews on the Ruhr dams on the Mohne and Eder Rivers – eight bombers are lost and the damage is not sufficient to be decisive. Wing Commander Guy Gibson leads the Mohne Raid. A tough and brash yet highly professional officer, he expects much of his crews and yet leads by example – taking 30 minutes and repeated passes over the Mohne Dam to get the ‘bouncing bomb’ attacks in perfectly and to distract flak from the other bombers making their runs. Already highly decorated, this night’s work earns him the Victoria Cross.

May 17th: The fifth anti-partisan sweep in Yugoslavia pits 120,000 Axis troops (led by the 1st Mountain Division and SS Prinz Eugen Division) against Tito’s 20,000 guerrillas.

May 18th: The UN Food Conference begins in Hot Springs, Virginia. The northern and southern beachheads on Attu link-up.

May 19th: American troops on Attu close in on Chicagof Harbour.

May 20th: The Japanese have a well constructed defence line in caves overlooking Clevesy Pass on Attu, and this will hold up the American advance for a week.

May 21st: The French naval squadron interned in Alexandria since June 1940 decides to join the Allies.

May 22nd: The Soviets announce the dissolution of the Comintern. Faced with soaring U-Boat casualties, Doenitz recalls all U-boats from patrols in the North Atlantic but will continue to send submarines to the Caribbean and south of the Azores

Annual General Meeting - Bessborough Armoury 9 May 2018 From the BCR News

The 2018 Annual General Meeting of members of RUSI Vancouver was held in the lecture room of the 15th Field RCA Armoury on Wednesday, May 9, after a most enjoyable lunch prepared and served by the acknowledged expert, Mrs. Lum. After the luncheon, at the beginning of the formalities, RUSI President, Cam Cathcart, called upon the Society’s lawyer, Ted Hawthorne of HPLaw, to come forth and be recognized by the members for his long-time support of RUSI Vancouver as “Special Counsel”. Honorary Colonel Hawthorne was then presented with a very attractive plaque in recognition of his support. President Cathcart was generous with his praise of Colonel Hawthorne’s work within the military community and generally in the “not for profit sector”.

At the conclusion of the business part of the meeting, Colonel Hawthorne provided the meeting with a brief overview of the transition requirements under the Societies Act and confirmed that the Society had been transition as required.

Congratulations to the newly elected Board of Directors of RUSI Vancouver and every success in the future!

New Tactical Armoured Patrol Vehicle for the BCR

BCR Association News and Wikipedia

One of the Regiment's new TAPV's made its debut at the May 12, 73rd BC Military Gala. The Textron TAPV (Tactical Armoured Patrol Vehicle) is an armoured car currently in use by the Canadian Army. It is essentially a more heavily armed and armoured upgrade of the M1117 Armoured Security Vehicle, developed for use by the military police of the US Armed Forces. The Tactical Armoured Patrol Vehicle (TAPV) program began in 2009, and in 2012 the contract was awarded to Textron Systems, Inc. On August 16, 2016, Textron systems delivered the first Tactical Armoured Patrol Vehicle (TAPV) to the Canadian Army. An eventual 500 vehicles will be purchased, with the option to order an additional 100. The TAPV is powered by a Cummins QSL diesel engine, which provides 365 horsepower (272 kW), allowing the vehicle a maximum speed of 105 km/h (65 mph), and a maximum range of 644 km (400 miles). The vehicle utilizes an independent suspension axle system originally developed by Irish Timoney, and it has a central tire inflation system to prevent flat tires during combat operations.

The TAPV relies upon composite armour to provide the maximum protection to the vehicle's occupants. The armour is slated as being 20% better than the armour on the M1117. The TAPV also has a V-shaped hull, which provides protection against mine and improvised explosive device (IED) blasts. The vehicle also has a high ground clearance, which increases protection from mine and IED blasts. It can withstand up to 10 kg of explosive force directly under its hull and can resist even 12.7mm armour-piercing rounds. Each of the seats in the vehicle are blast protected, and the vehicle has vented wheel wells to disperse the energy of an explosion out from the vehicle. The TAPV is slated to have a remote weapons system based on the M151 Protector. The weapon system is called the Dual Remote Weapon System and can mount both a C6 7.62mm general purpose machine gun and either a HK GMG 40mm automatic grenade launcher or a M2HB 12.7mm heavy machine gun. The vehicle also possesses numerous smoke grenade launchers located throughout the hull.

Military Leaders Sent Them on A Hasty, Ill-Planned Mission

— And Are Now Blaming Them PAUL SZOLDRA May 10, 2018

The Pentagon has briefed reporters on its long-awaited investigation of the deadly Oct. 4, 2017 ambush in Niger, where four American and four Nigerien soldiers were killed, and its report passes more blame on the fallen soldiers than the leadership above them. I obtained the 8-page unclassified summary of the investigation by US Africa Command, which offers findings and recommendations that it claims it based on “all available evidence” from the incident in Tongo Tongo. According to the report, the investigating team received photos, video, audio, and witness testimony from 143 people. But most shockingly, amid the deadliest combat incident for American soldiers in Africa since “Black Hawk Down,” most of the blame in Africom’s report is attached to the dead, who cannot speak in their own defense. On Oct. 3, 2017, an 11-man Special Forces team, including Sfc Jeremiah Johnson, Staff Sgt Bryan Black, Staff Sgt Dustin Wright, and Sgt LaDavid Johnson, left their outpost on what The New York Times described as a “routine, low risk patrol with little chance of encountering the enemy.” The report, however, says the Green Berets and their Nigerien counterparts — referred to as Team Ouallam since that’s where they were based out of — went out on a counterterrorism operation “targeting a key member of ISIS.” This however, then raises the question: If they knew they were conducting a raid on a terrorist stronghold, why weren’t they all wearing body armor, carrying heavy machine-guns, and rolling in bulletproof vehicles? And why, when raids can go wrong so quickly, was there not close air support standing by or a plan for medical evacuation should it be needed?

These are the questions I raise, which are not substantially addressed in the report. Instead, the report says that prior to their deployment to Niger, “personnel turnover” prevented the team from conducting “key pre-deployment collective training” (blaming the soldiers for not conducting the training their command should have been keeping track of). It goes on to mention the team did not carry out “pre-mission rehearsals” (something that just about every single American unit in Iraq or Afghanistan likely fails to do on a daily basis, given their operational tempo), and claims that “only two members of Team Ouallam were wearing their Personal Protective Equipment (PPE),” adding that some members put it on while others did not (again blaming soldiers for not wearing body armor, when clearly they were not briefed on intelligence indicating they needed it on at all times). There probably would have been a far different result had the soldiers been given air on station or bulletproof trucks with .50 caliber machine-guns mounted on top, and it would not have mattered if they were wearing their flak jackets or ESS goggles. This report’s assertions are shameful. Four American soldiers are dead because their mission was repeatedly and hastily changed; they were given thin-skinned vehicles with no heavy weapons, had no air support or medevac support nearby, and apparently not enough intelligence that could have told them a force of 50-plus insurgents was working to surround them with mortars, heavy machine-guns, and rocket-propelled grenades. Most of these problems can be traced back to the team’s leadership, but instead this report seems to give them a pass.

Still, the answer to some questions can be found when reading between the lines of the report which says the initial Concept of Operations (CONOP) — an Army document that outlines a commander’s intent, the objective, and how the mission should play out — was not approved “at the proper level of command.” The mission was approved at the captain’s level, the report says, where both he and the team commander “inaccurately characterized” the mission’s true intent, which would have required much higher-level approval. Soon after the team made initial contact with the enemy, they called in troops in contact. Amid a hellish firefight from all sides, the report says, a driver of one of the friendly trucks made a radio call saying they were going to be overrun. “The radio call occurred 53 minutes after first contact and was Team Ouallam’s first request for assistance,” it says, which can be read as the team’s fault for not asking for help on the radio sooner, when you can watch the helmet-cam footage and see that the situation was incredibly desperate, and there was little cover to be found. To their leadership’s credit, the captain who approved the initial mission alerted both Nigerien forces and his Special Operations Command bosses soon after troops in contact was called in, but as the timeline is detailed in the report, it is clear that proper planning was not done ahead of time (emphasis added). “Both partners responded immediately. Nigerien ground forces departed 8 minutes after notification and arrived in Tongo Tongo approximately 4 hours and 25 minutes later due to distance, lack of roads, and rough terrain. French Mirage aircraft conducted the first show of force approximately 47 minutes after receiving notification. A single Nigerien helicopter took off approximately 40 minutes after receiving the request.”

The first sign of support didn’t come until 47 minutes later — an eternity in a firefight, especially in this one when the Americans and Nigeriens were surrounded by a much larger force. Illustrating the failure of planning is this line: “All four soldiers were killed in action before French and Nigerien responding forces arrived in Tongo Tongo.” And even then, “the French aircraft were unable to engage because they could not identify US troop locations and did not have communications with the team on the ground” (Who in leadership was supposed to ensure the troops vehicles were properly marked, and were friendly troops given infrared or other markings on their uniforms that could be seen from the air? The report doesn’t say). If you want to see the one moment of pure truth in this report, it not surprisingly comes toward the end, which I will reproduce here in full:

“Contradictory and ambiguous CONOPs approval matrices between Special Operations Command Africa, Special Operations Command Forward-North and West Africa, [Special Operations Command and Control Element], and the [Advanced Operations Base] resulted in confusion regarding proper approval level for certain types of CONOPS. A reliance on templated CONOPS (cut and paste from previous CONOPS), a lack of attention to detail in quality control and quality assurance, and inadequate notification of CONOPS to [Special Operations Command-Africa] all contributed to a general lack of situational awareness and command oversight at every level. The CONOPS development, review, approval, and notification processes were pro-forma and did not reflect the detailed, deliberate planning and oversight tools they are intended to be.” What this translates to is that someone back at US Africa Command failed to put together clear guidance on what operations would be approved and by whom. Meanwhile, in Niger, the team’s company command leadership was “copying and pasting” together documents related to future missions, thus setting up these four Americans for failure. The lack of “situational awareness and command oversight” is what killed these men, not their lack of protective gear.

Legislation Aims to Address Gaps in Canada's Military Courts

Proposes a victims' bill of rights. Lee Berthiaume The Canadian Press May 10, 2018

The proposed changes come only a few weeks before federal auditor general Michael Ferguson is scheduled to release a report on the military justice system. The new legislation would require military tribunals to consider the circumstances of Indigenous offenders when deciding on jail time and require formal courts martial for criminal cases rather than leaving some with unit commanders.

(DAVID KAWAI / THE CANADIAN PRESS)

OTTAWA—The federal government is promising to close what some consider significant and long-standing gaps within the country's military court system with a new declaration of the rights of victims. Defence Minister Harjit Sajjan unveiled proposed legislation on Thursday, which would provide victims in military cases with many of the same rights to information, protection and participation as those already available in the civilian system. "This is the right thing to do," Sajjan told a news conference at National Defence Headquarters in Ottawa. "This will ensure victims have a voice and that their voices are heard." The new legislation would also require military tribunals to consider the circumstances of Indigenous offenders when deciding on jail time and require formal courts martial for criminal cases rather than leaving some with unit commanders. The measures, if adopted, would represent a dramatic change to the way victims interact with the military justice system, which a recent internal review found was perceived as being unfair and opaque.

The legislation is similar to changes proposed by the Harper government in June 2015, but which died a few weeks later with the start of the federal election campaign. It is considered long overdue by many inside and outside the military. While Canada's bill of rights for victims came into effect three years ago, it exempted the military court system, much to the chagrin of many, particularly given concerns about sexual misconduct in the Forces. The military's top prosecutor and a senior Canadian Forces military police officer both told The Canadian Press in 2016 that they wanted a victims' bill of rights for military tribunals. The federal victims' ombudsman also flagged concerns about "the gap in the rights of victims of crime within the Canadian military justice system" in November 2016. The proposed changes come only a few weeks before federal auditor general Michael Ferguson is scheduled to release a report on the military justice system. Sajjan defended the fact it took three years for the legislation to be introduced, given its similarities to what the Harper government proposed, saying the Liberals took the time necessary to deliver for the Canadian Forces and victims. "And tabling a bill just days before an election is called, you know where it's going to end up," he said in reference to the Conservatives. "So, our government is serious about making sure that we make the changes that look after our people."

The proposed legislation includes provisions that would let victims better track their cases, seek compensation from perpetrators, and establish special liaison officers to help military members, families and civilians navigate the system. It also broadens the ways in which victim impact statements can be delivered during courts martial and gives victims the right to complain if they feel their rights have been violated. The plan to strip commanding officers of their power to hear serious cases, particularly those of a criminal nature, is also a significant shift in terms of perceived fairness, but also so commanders are better able to deal efficiently with minor disciplinary matters. “What we will have in place will make sure we have a system that is simplified and will allow unit commanders to impose much quicker discipline and in a simpler way,” said Commodore Genevieve Bernatchez, the military’s top legal officer. Sajjan said he’s not concerned that sending all serious cases to court martial would lead to more delays in the military justice system, which has been struggling with the same backlog issues as its civilian counterpart. “We are going to adjust resources if necessary to make sure that the process goes as quickly as possible, that we can have cases that are heard, and more importantly, justice for the victims.” The proposed legislation was welcomed by retired colonel Michel Drapeau, one of the country’s top experts on military law, who credited Bernatchez with pushing what he argued were some much-needed reforms to the system. “It is not a panacea,” Drapeau said of the impact the proposed changes would have on the military justice system, “but it is a very good step in the right direction.”

Who Is It

Last Week: This photo is of a practise water landing against a prepared position at Kitsilano Beach, possibly in 1942. Probably a rehearsal for the upcoming operation in the Aleutians. Archie Steacy and his brother were in the crowd watching the event and he states that a 3.7" anti aircraft gun was also shooting at a drogue flying over English Bay as part of the exercise, giving a bit of realism to the operation. We know that the AA troop from the Oak and 41st location would move to this area to conduct live fire exercises, as featured in the quiz photo of a few months (Aug 2017)back. That photo may have been of one of the guns firing here.

This Week: This week's mystery photo could be from the frozen plains of distant Manitoba, or some similar semi-civilized part of this great dominion of ours. However, as it depicts an armoured train, and given that the only one in Canadian service was a tiny thing up on the Skeena River, near Prince Rupert, it can't be here. We will start with the assumption that this is, indeed, an armoured train. It is, in fact, one with a very, very interesting history, and one with which I can claim a rather distant connection, as the father of an ancient professor of my acquaintance once helped refurbish it when it was passed on to one of its final owners.

Therefore, dear rail buffs and history enthusiasts, who do you think build this mighty train, and with whom did it serve. Even better, if you know where it is now, please let us know, as it would make an excellent “mobile wall” to sell to a certain US head of state for use on his southern border. Send your musings to the editor, bob.mugford@outlook.com or to the author, John Redmond (johnd._redmond@telus.net). Děkuji!
